Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 10-week training program on the heart rate variability (HRV) of young adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The subjects were 20 young adults (10 males and 10 females) who were randomly assigned to two groups: a control group and a training group. The control group was instructed to maintain their current level of physical activity, while the training group was instructed to engage in a 10-week training program consisting of aerobic and resistance training. The HRV was measured using a heart rate monitor and a computer program. The results showed that the training group had a significant increase in HRV compared to the control group. The increase in HRV was observed in all measures of HRV, including the standard deviation of normal-to-normal intervals (SDNN), the standard deviation of the average normal-to-normal intervals (SDANN), the standard deviation of the average normal-to-normal intervals (SDANN), the standard deviation of the average normal-to-normal intervals (SDANN), and the standard deviation of the average normal-to-normal intervals (SDANN). The results suggest that a 10-week training program can improve HRV in young adults.

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the heart rate (HR) and heart rate reserve (HRR) of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group and an exercise group. The exercise group performed a 12-week training program consisting of three sessions per week, each lasting 30 minutes. The control group did not exercise. The HR and HRR were measured at rest and during maximal exercise at the beginning and end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the exercise group had a significant decrease in HR and HRR at rest and during maximal exercise compared to the control group. The control group had no significant change in HR and HRR. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the cardiovascular fitness of sedentary middle-aged men.
