of semi infinite bi element targets in depth of penetration DOP testing initially arose from the need to rank performance of ceramic materials under ballistic impact Ceramics exhibit complex damage responses Interpretation of DOP results for ceramic metal target combinations can be difficult and sometimes misleading Recent work examined bi element metal metal targets to determine additional damage mechanisms present in the earlier DOP ceramic metal target responses Significant target interactions were demonstrated in either combination with or in addition to specific damage mechanisms inherent in the ceramic response The target interactions considered before arose from mismatched densities at the target target interface Through an analytical model the density effect and time dependent mechanisms were separated The current work which includes titanium diboride rolled homogeneous armor RHA and titanium diboride titanium alloy bi element target designs provides target combinations that are density matched and strength matched The current work presents these new data and provides an analysis to normalize DOP responses for all target combinations A ceramic damage function that could partially link experimental results to analysis is defined Comprehensive Visualization of Interface Defeat-Based Ballistic Impact Damage in a Titanium Carbide (TiC) Ceramic Target Disk ,2001 This study was initiated to demonstrate the feasibility of applying the state of the art nondestructive testing methodology known as x ray computed tomography CT to a ballistic damage assessment Specifically desired is the capture digitization and display in both two dimensional 2 D and three dimensional 3 D formats of the actual mesocracking damage created in bulk ceramic targets following an interface defeat or dwell ballistic impact experiment Dwell involves the delay and interface defeat involves the prevention of penetration by a long rod penetrator into the ceramic In each mechanism the penetrator material contacting the ceramic front face flows laterally These mechanisms occur at or near the impacted front surface of a highly confined armor ceramic material and may result in considerable subsurface or interior damage This study also reports on the development of a new capability to graphically represent the full assemblage of networked interior mesocracks by an isolated 3 D point cloud or wireform model which aids significantly in the visualization and understanding of the entire mesocracking damage network Practical limits of image spatial resolution with this technique approx equal 400 micrometers for large volume samples preclude the nondestructive characterization of the detailed microcracking damage at this time
